AIM AND OBJECTIVE

The aim of attending this seminar is to gain a comprehensive understanding of the challenges and innovative approaches in the field of nano-based drug delivery systems. It is our goal to explore the latest advancements in this rapidly evolving area of pharmaceutical research and to leverage this knowledge to enhance our work in drug development and delivery.

ABOUT THE SEMINAR

Nano based drug delivery systems have emerged as a promising frontier in the pharmaceutical field, offering innovative solutions to enhance drug efficacy and reduce adverse effects. This abstract provides an overview of the challenges associated with conventional drug delivery and explores the various approaches that nanotechnology offers to address these issues. One of the key challenges in nano based drug delivery is the design and engineering of nanocarriers. This abstract discusses the different types of nanoparticles and nanocarriers, including liposomes, polymeric nanoparticles, and dendrimers, emphasizing their ability to encapsulate and transport a wide range of drug compounds. Additionally, surface modifications with ligands and biomolecules enable specific targeting, making these systems ideal for personalized medicine.

In conclusion, nano based drug delivery systems present an exciting avenue for overcoming the limitations of conventional drug delivery. They offer a more precise and effective means of drug administration, making them a promising option for enhancing patient care and treatment outcomes. However, a comprehensive understanding of the challenges and the development of safe, scalable, and cost-effective solutions are paramount for their successful integration into clinical practice. This abstract provides a concise overview of these critical considerations, highlighting the significant potential of nano based drug delivery systems in the pharmaceutical and medical fields.
